

Introduction to Comparative Politics (Spring 2026)

Course Syllabus

(Translated, originally in Chinese)

Li Shao
shaoli@zju.edu.cn
School of Public Affairs, Room 634

1 Class Time and Location

- Time: Wednesdays, 10:00–11:35 a.m.; Fridays, 8:00–9:35 a.m.
- Location: Zijingang Campus, West Teaching Building 1, Room 314
- Office hours: Tuesdays, 10:00–11:30 a.m., or by email appointment

2 Course Objectives

1. Understand commonly used concepts and theories in political science, become familiar with their English expressions, and read political reporting in serious English-language media.
2. Understand the subject matter and foundational theories of comparative politics and apply those theories to political phenomena.
3. Improve reading comprehension of political science and broader social science literature in both Chinese and English.
4. Learn methods and channels for acquiring knowledge and information related to comparative politics, especially ways to use artificial intelligence to improve study and research.
5. This is an introductory course in comparative politics. The advanced follow-up course is Comparative Political Institutions, offered in the summer term.

3 Assignments and Assessment

3.1 Assessment

The course grade consists of class participation, a final project, and a final examination.

- Class participation: 30%;
  1. Attendance (10%): Attendance is required, but one unexcused absence is permitted without penalty.
  2. Pre-class questions (15%): For each class unit, submit at least one question on Xuezaizheda based on the assigned readings and course topic. You must also answer at least one classmate's question, use AI to answer one classmate's question, or comment on an AI-generated answer by agreeing or disagreeing and explaining your reasons. You may ask and answer your own question. Both tasks must be completed before the relevant class meeting to receive credit. Identify the AI service used. You may also report that the AI was unable to answer.
  3. Classroom performance (5%): Determined by the instructor based on participation in classroom discussion. Active participation on Xuezaizheda may receive discretionary bonus credit.

- Final project: 40%;
- Final examination: 30%.

In addition to the rules above, I reserve the right to grant additional rewards to students who perform exceptionally well or make substantial progress, and to penalize students who do not engage seriously with the course.

3.2 Final Project

The final project requires students to read a book in comparative politics and write both a book introduction and a critical review. It has two parts. Part I (the book introduction) is worth 15% of the final course grade and receives a common group grade. Part II (the critical review) is worth 25% and receives an individual grade.

1. In Part I, you will be randomly assigned to a group of four (or three) students and jointly write an introduction to the selected book.
  - (a) Give your group a name in the form “XX Reading Society” or “XX Reading Group.” Include the group name on all assignments.
  - (b) Select one book from the reading list at the end of this syllabus and organize group reading and discussion meetings. Each group must read a different book. If you want to read a book that is not on the list, you may propose one, but it must receive my approval.
  - (c) Jointly write an introduction to the book’s main content. In your own words, briefly explain its main research question, main argument, theoretical logic, logic connecting the empirical evidence to the argument, principal evidence, stated theoretical contribution, and chapter organization. Recommended length: approximately 2,000 Chinese characters or an equivalent English length.
2. In Part II, independently write a critical review of the book, presenting your own reflections and analysis. Recommended length: approximately 2,000 Chinese characters or an equivalent English length.
  - (a) Select the book’s main argument or one subsidiary argument as the focus of your review.
  - (b) Find literature that engages with that argument (at least three articles and one book), ideally including one or two alternative explanations or extensions.
  - (c) Compare differences in arguments and evidence between the literature you find and the original book, and discuss possible reasons for those differences.
  - (d) Make an academic evaluation by assessing the theoretical logic and empirical evidence of the literature.
  - (e) You may not choose the same analytical angle and literature as another member of your group. If you use the same literature and/or argumentative position as your primary object of comparison, the work will be treated as mutual plagiarism. You may cite and comment on reviews and sources used by other students.
  - (f) Coordinate with your group members about the literature each person will read. Exchange completed drafts and revise them afterward.
  - (g) At the end of the course, I will review Part I in class. Do not repeat in Part II the problems identified in Part I.
3. Follow the requirements below:
  - (a) All analysis must be supported by reliable and diverse information and evidence. Evaluate sources carefully and select reliable channels of information. Every claim or piece of evidence that is not your own opinion must have a footnote; otherwise, it will be treated as plagiarism. Contact me early if you have difficulty finding sources.
  - (b) Write clearly and logically and format the document carefully. The first page must include the title, your name, student ID, and an abstract of no more than 150 Chinese characters or an equivalent English length. Begin the main text on page 2. Use appropriate subheadings and paragraphs, 12-point type, single spacing, top and bottom margins of 2.54 cm, and left and right margins of 3.18 cm.

- (c) Use APSA style for English-language sources and CNKI style for Chinese-language sources. For non-academic online sources, provide the URL. If a URL exceeds one line, shorten it using bitly.com or a similar service.
- (d) Your personal conclusion is not graded as right or wrong. The quality of your argument matters more than the conclusion.
- (e) Submit all written assignments in PDF format.

3.2.1 Required Submissions

1. Book selection: register on the discussion board. No two groups may select the same book; first come, first served. (Deadline: Friday of Week 2)
2. Introduction to the book's main content: submit to the group assignment portal. (Deadline: Sunday of Week 6, April 12)
3. Individual critical review: submit to the individual assignment portal. (Deadline: tentatively Sunday of Week 1 of the summer term)
4. Combined volume containing the group introduction and individual reviews. (Deadline: tentatively Sunday of Week 1 of the summer term)
5. After the deadline, 10% of the earned grade will be deducted for each day of delay until no points remain.

3.2.2 Final Project Grading Criteria

1. The paper presents a clear argument; its logic is fluent, rigorous, and internally consistent; its analysis is supported by sufficient reasoning or evidence; and its citations rely on credible sources documented in footnotes. (60%)
2. The writing is clear and accessible, uses topic paragraphs or subheadings to summarize key claims, and then develops the argument. (30%)
3. The document is neatly formatted, free of typographical errors, and easy to read. (10%)
4. There is no strict word-count requirement, but a clear argument and sufficient discussion will likely require at least 1,000 Chinese characters or an equivalent English length.

3.3 Final Examination

The final examination is a closed-book, in-class examination and may cover all material taught during the semester. A more specific list of covered content and concepts will be provided beforehand.

The examination consists entirely of written-response questions in three main formats: term identification, short answers, and analytical comparison. Term identification tests understanding of important concepts and may use English expressions. Short-answer questions test knowledge and understanding of individual theories. Analytical comparison questions test the ability to analyze and compare multiple theories.

The examination will consist of approximately 80% basic material and 20% more difficult material.

4 Course Materials

The course is organized primarily around assigned readings and has no fixed textbook. Each week, you will be required to read two or three English- or Chinese-language works listed in the schedule. The readings are directly related to the course content and will help you understand the lectures and prepare for the examination. Required articles and books will be available through Xuezaizheda. I may also recommend additional materials in class or in the DingTalk group. Students are welcome to seek out and recommend further materials.

5 Use of Software and Electronic Devices

1. Some activities require interaction through a mobile phone using Xuezaizheda. Apart from those activities, using a phone for unrelated content is prohibited. Violations will affect your participation grade, and no additional warning will be given.
2. Handwritten notes, whether in a notebook or on a tablet, are encouraged, although typed notes are also permitted. Photographing slides as a substitute for taking notes is discouraged. For this reason, my slides will be deliberately concise.

6 Use of Artificial Intelligence

1. You may use artificial intelligence to assist with information gathering and brainstorming, but you may not directly adopt an AI-generated writing plan as the argument of your paper; doing so will result in a failing grade.
2. If you use an AI service to assist with your paper, cite or acknowledge it in a standard format. Failure to disclose such use, if discovered, will be treated as academic misconduct. For example, a footnote may state: “The description in this paragraph of the course of the Iranian Revolution was synthesized by DeepSeek. The underlying information comes from [cite reliable sources here]. The discussion connecting the Iranian Revolution to the theory in this paper is my own work.”
3. Artificial intelligence is not a reliable information source. Do not cite information provided by AI directly; locate and cite reliable sources.

7 Communication

The course has two main communication channels: the DingTalk group and email. Email is the primary channel. Course announcements will be posted on DingTalk. If you have an individual question or need to arrange a meeting, send an email. On weekdays, I will try to reply within 24 hours. Responses may be delayed on weekends. Please observe basic email etiquette.

I will not add students' personal WeChat accounts for this course.

8 Classroom Discussion

Questions and discussion of difficult issues are encouraged. Students who think actively and participate in discussion may receive participation or bonus credit. When speaking, respect other students' views, address the issue rather than the person, and remain on topic.

9 Absence Policy

If you cannot attend class, email me in advance. Medical absences require documentation from the university hospital, and absences for official duties require university documentation.

10 Academic Integrity and Misconduct

The course has a zero-tolerance policy toward academic misconduct. Assignments and examinations must be completed independently and must represent your own original work.

Cheating on the final project includes: (1) copying wording from prior publications and presenting it as original work; (2) reproducing both the claims and main arguments of prior publications; and (3) using content from prior publications as original work without citing the source. The first two forms result in a grade of zero. For the third form, one instance lowers the grade by one level, and three instances result in a grade of zero.

Students found copying from classmates or bringing unauthorized answers into an examination will be referred to the university under its regulations.
